Young people with mental health problems are disproportionately affected by youth homelessness. A third of 14-18 year olds with a mental health problem are having treatment delayed; it is the leading cause of mortality in young people and the illness is linked to higher crime. Yet the government is not allowing councils to publicly release the data from their new youth homelessness initiative. This means there is no transparency on how the service is working in its approach to mental health, not least the way it is comparing and scaling up its three year £110m programme. Every year 50,000 children and young people enter homeless hostels. They often have mental health problems and often experience traumatic events. This contributes to a child and adolescent mental health crisis in England and poses a significant risk to the health of the whole population. Mental illness, from anxiety to post-traumatic stress disorder, has serious consequences. More than half of homeless hostel residents with mental health problems have suicidal thoughts, often linked to the difficulties and stigma they face in accessing services. They are subject to higher mortality rates. Young people are being affected by substance misuse, criminal activity, mental health difficulties, physical ill health and homelessness. I would be concerned that the government is overlooking some of the very serious issues, including adolescent mental health and population health, that it has identified as being at the root of the issue. Everyone who approaches this issue with the government should be told how many mental health problems young homeless f30f4ceada
