Methods for digitally synthesizing speech signals are widely used in various technologies, such as in speech recognition. Voice synthesis apparatuses are used for users who cannot make actual production of speech by their own voices. However, for example, when a voice synthesis apparatus synthesizes a voice having the same voice feature as a user who originally provides a voice (hereinafter, referred to as the "original voice") or the same voice as a voice of a person who is unaware of whether or not he/she does not have the same voice feature as the original voice (hereinafter, referred to as the "fake voice"), if the voice synthesis apparatus synthesizes the voice of the original voice, the synthesized voice may sound unnatural. To prevent the unnatural voice from sounding due to imitation of the original voice or the fake voice of a speaker, if the sound source of the original voice is not identified, it is necessary to provide a voice with the naturalness of a speaker. However, in the configuration of the above-described method, the identification of the sound source of the original voice is not always reliable depending on the quality of the original voice. For example, when a frequency parameter is used in the above-described method, the frequency parameter is extracted from the original voice and then is compared with the same parameter extracted from the fake voice to identify the sound source of the fake voice. However, in the configuration of the above-described method
