The problems experienced by older people in attaining low-level office jobs are relevant to any possible changes to the present urban work environment. We shall address this issue through comparison of the occupational potential of men aged 65 and over who have an insufficient degree of mental capacity to comply with the (employment) law at present. This study provides an answer to the question of how older people should be accommodated in an office environment. This can be done both by increasing the allowances for sick leave and the possibilities for a transfer of work, or by extending the working hours. This must be done in a balanced way, however. Since it is questionable whether there is much difference in occupational experience between old people with a sufficient degree of mental capacity and those who are mentally retarded, only the first group will be considered. The study has a 2-point design: An investigation of the possibilities for an individual who has a mental capacity of Sufficient/insufficient will be performed. A total of 127 people will be investigated during a period of about one year. The choice of a sample is based on occupational activity, and will be complemented by interviews and observations. The measurement instruments include interviews and standardized tests. The results will give an indication of whether it would be beneficial to increase the legal provisions for sick leave and the possibilities for a transfer of work, or the extended working hours. This will help in the decision on how an organization for the aged has to provide for its employees who are not eligible at present. In an accompanying paper, restrictions on services to elderly people will be discussed. Amsterdam District Court said the government had failed to prove its case.
