Using in situ hybridization histochemistry, we examined the localization of the mRNA for the peptide precursor to enkephalin in the epithelium of the human oesophagus. The application of repeated pressure waves with a 5-cm-long air-pressurized bladder probe (0.1-1.5-s stimulus) to the oesophageal mucosa led to an increased density of hybridization signals associated with an increase of labeled cells in a pattern and distribution that corresponded to that of the input signals. The appearance of the signals was delayed compared with the input signals. It is concluded that 1) the synthesis of enkephalin is induced at the level of individual epithelial cells, and 2) the morphological changes of the epithelial cell (from dendritic to flat-type) associated with enkephalin synthesis are being influenced by mechanical stimulation.May 2003: as Britain and the United States secretly agree on a deal to invade Iraq, the British Government tells the Prime Minister (Tony Blair) and the Foreign Secretary (Jack Straw) that Labour cannot support the war. There is an angry showdown. What will Tony Blair do? The background to this question has emerged from the 2003 Conservative Party conference, where Michael Howard, the Prime Minister, and his Shadow Foreign Secretary, Geoffrey Howe, are presenting their party's case. At the end, the Conservatives support military action against Iraq. As they say: "We are now convinced that the evidence of Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction is sufficiently serious to justify a decisive international response." Soon after, we find out that the Government has changed its mind. "We should never have fought this war," says Jack Straw, the Foreign Secretary (The Guardian, 18 November 2003). But he adds that the Tories were forced to side with Labour (The Guardian, 27 November 2003). So where did this change come from? Who changed the Government's mind? The Prime Minister's Office and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office work together to protect the Prime Minister's interests and those of the Government in the build up to war. That is what the Government's Foreign Office,
